124: There were 180: Congressional Record, S10709, September 7, 1989.

126: There were groups representing: ibid.

129: Patrisha Wright had urged them to do so: The Senate moved quickly and passed the ADA on September 7, 1989, by a 76–8 margin. But the pace slowed when the bill reached the House of Representatives, where four committees had jurisdiction, not one. Bush, who had lobbied for the bill with senators, was more aloof from the battle in the House. Some ADA supporters complained that Bush was seeking to have it both ways—in part not to further anger critics of the bill, particularly the small business lobby. Still, Bush's endorsement of disability rights gave the ADA a winning patina of bipartisanship, which put it on a sure track to passage. The House of Representatives voted 403–20 on May 22, 1990, for the ADA. The House and Senate then passed the final version of the bill on July 12 and July 13.

275: "We are dealing": ibid.
275: "Death means to me": ibid.
275: In a half hour: ibid.
287: Ten days later: Rhonda Cook, “Disabled Protesters Occupy
Governor’s Office for 6 Hours,” Atlanta Journal and Constitution, April 21, 1990.

CHAPTER TEN: CROSSING THE LUCK LINE

295: That night, when he got home: ibid.
296: “They would fit in with the crowd”: ibid.

EPILOGUE: HOW THE DISABILITY RIGHTS MOVEMENT IS CHANGING AMERICA

330: The city erected a plaque: The 1978 protesters were part of the Denver-based Atlantis community, which, after several years of local bus protests, would evolve into the national organization ADAPT in July 1983.
There would be a setback for ADAPT in February 1993 when Wade Blank, the former Presbyterian minister who had marched with Martin Luther King, Jr., at Selma and who had been ADAPT's visionary founder and co-director drowned in Mexico on a family vacation, as he tried to rescue his son from a strong Pacific Ocean undertow. Blank had reached eight-year-old Lincoln, but the current then swept away father and son.

331: "And just the opposite": ibid.

332: "And you know": ibid.
